NEEDS ANALYSIS:

International Alert and the research centre Integrity published a first study on assessing institutional capacity for conflict sensitivity, which focused on the health sector but bears relevant consideration for the overall response's effort to promote social cohesion. The key findings of the study confirm that competition around access to accomodation, basic services (particularly water and sanitation), and employment remain the key drivers of tensions in Lebanon. In the health sector, the study found that tensions primarily revolve around negative perceptions related to fertility rate, lack of hygiene and fears that refugees would spread communicable diseases, and frustration related to the perception that the international assistance allows refugees to be unfairly privileged in their access to cheaper healthcare. This leads to increasing segregation of Lebanese and Syrian patients in primary health care centres, with host communities avoiding facilities used by refugees.

The report underlines that while there is a widespread belief that tensions can only be mitigated by committing extra resources, there is considerable room for more conflict sensitive practices in the delivery of services, notably through better information and communication to dismiss negative perceptions and prejudices.
